The importance of the ISC to intelligence document processing activities in other agencies ^{is} ~~will~~ be described in Chapter X. The constant search for improving the ISC ~~was~~ ^{was} indicated by the fact that there were three editions published of the major 1960 revision alone: 1962, 1964 and 1967. In between these editions continuing review, expansion, and revision ^{well} ~~was~~ going on to meet new exigencies. [REDACTED]

In August 1960, for ^{instance} ~~example~~, an internal OCR Intellofax Task Group, consisting of representatives from the Document and Machine Divisions, the CIA Library and the Automation Development group prepared a study for their respective Division Chiefs. The study proposed a modification of indexing requirements and techniques as well as an expansion of the Intellofax files to provide for uniform and specific retrieval. The Chiefs ~~presented to the AD/CR and received approval for putting~~ ^{put} into effect their recommendations, ~~incorporating some from the study and including~~ detailed indexing modifications based on the newest revision (1960) of the ISC recently adopted by the intelligence community and on the experience gained in running the MINICARD test. ⁷

25X1A Later, in 1961, the same officials forwarded to the AD/CR a summary to a questionnaire on Intellofax improvements, submitted to DDI and DDP analysts. [REDACTED] were queried; approximately 50% responded. The gist of the recommendations was that emphasis on precise coding be continued, accompanied by increased selectivity, that complete document print ^{out} service be provided for Intellofax requesters, and that a new brochure on Intellofax be issued. ^{insert} One of the more interesting conclusions ^{contained in the aforementioned summary} from the referenced memorandum to the AD/CR ^{was} ~~is~~: "In the two instances where analysts were asked a substantive question relating to subject control, there were ^{25X1A} [REDACTED] replies. While this was a small-scale effort, the inference ^{was} ~~is~~ clear that customer participation in
